Portable device users are increasingly utilizing a variety of different applications to interact with others. For example, a user may communicate with others via a variety of different electronic messaging systems, including email, text messaging, and social networking messaging systems. As the number of different electronic messaging systems has increased, the difficulty of managing different and often unrelated electronic messages has increased. Electronic messages that are part of a conversation, for example, may be interspersed with electronic messages that are not part of the conversation and require separate actions to continue the conversation. One approach to managing and processing the many different types of electronic messages is for a user to forward selected electronic messages as a "thread." For example, a user may forward electronic messages to a "thread" by selecting a forward icon associated with a selected electronic message, which may be presented as a list of electronic messages for selection. The user may then select to forward the electronic message to the thread, which causes a new electronic message to be generated for the thread and may also cause existing electronic messages in the thread to be forward to the new electronic message.Determination of inorganic selenium in cheese by ion chromatography with mass spectrometry.
